

If you use a Object Oriented programming language instead of procedural programming language in a large software project , it will be easier to adapt changes in requirements during the project

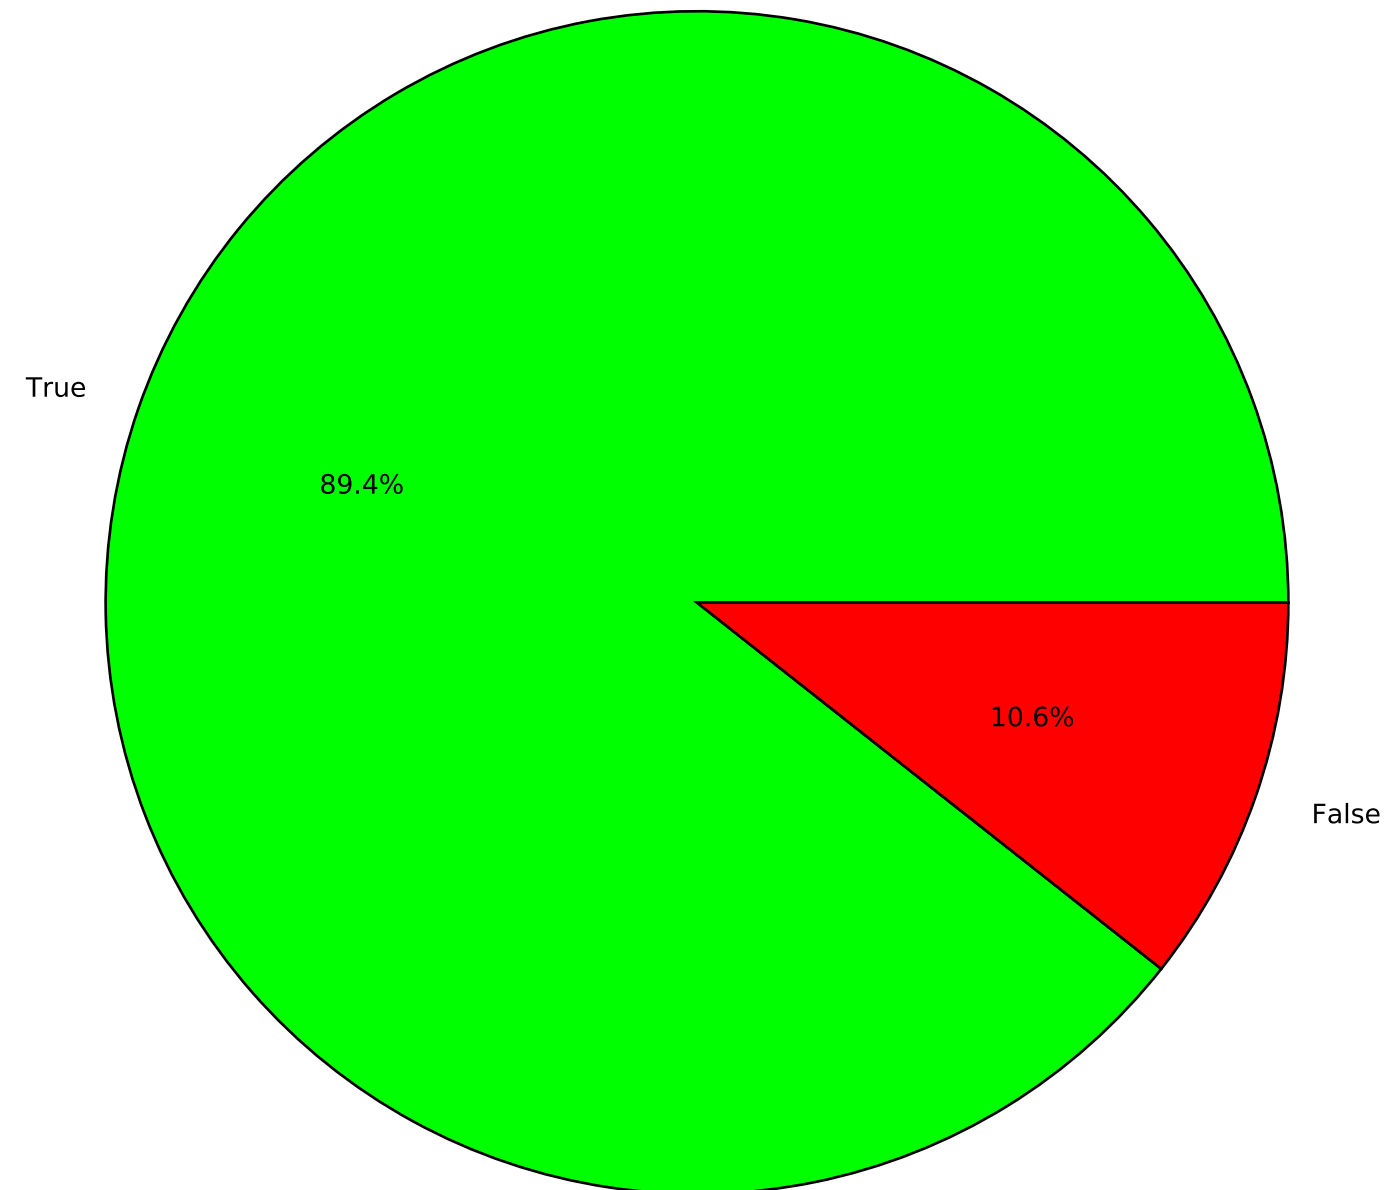

use a Object Oriented programming language instead of procedural programming language in a large software project approach, the resulting software will be easier to extend by adding new features based on new r

If you use a Object Oriented programming language instead of procedural programming language in a large software project approach, it will be easier to fix bugs in the resulting software

If you use a Object Oriented programming language instead of procedural programming language in a large software project, the resulting software will be easier to change

If you use a Object Oriented programming language instead of procedural programming language in a large software project approach the resulting software will be easier to maintain

